The Logipi Interviews -- Consequences of Recession

Several months ago, UnitedLog asked Logipi to conduct a series of interviews with supply chain thought leaders from around the world. Our task was to pose the following questions to supply chain professionals from a variety of organizations and industries:

What are the consequences of the recession regarding supply chain management and innovation?

What improvements, good consequences and lessons learned do you see? How are we better off?

What will we be "missing?"

Are there things we will need to learn to live without?

Are there ways of working that need to be changed, either as a direct effect of the economic downfall, or to help avoid dire consequences in the future?

This month, UnitedLog took thirteen of the Logipi interviews and compiled them into an insightful synopsis. Presented in four parts, the articles provide a high-level look at the responses we received.

If you want more, UnitedLog has provided a list of interviewee names, titles and their business affiliations, along with links to their original Logipi interviews and podcasts.

Also, feel free to explore Logipi for other podcasts and articles about the consequences of the 2009 recession on the supply chain, as well as many other fascinating insights on a variety of other topics provided by your peers and colleagues.

Enjoy!

If you have something to add, we hope you'll leave a comment, or contact us for a one-on-one interview.
